Reflection ~

Kindness and compassion are among the principal things that make our lives meaningful. They are a source of lasting happiness and joy. They are the foundation of a good heart, the heart that acts out of a desire to help others. Through kindness and thus through affection, honesty, truth and justice toward everyone else, we ensure our own benefit. This is a matter of common sense. Consideration for others is worthwhile because our happiness is inextricably bound up with the happiness of others. Similarly, if society suffers, we ourselves suffer. On the other hand the more our hearts and minds are afflicted with ill-will, the more miserable we become. Therefore, we cannot avoid the necessity of kindness and compassion. On a simple practical level, kindness creates a sense of warmth and openness that allows us to communicate much more easily with other people. We discover that all human beings are just like us, so we are able to relate to them more easily. Cultivating positive mental states like kindness and compassion definitely leads to better health and happiness. Our lives will become meaningful, happier and more peaceful; we will make a positive contribution to the world around us.
